The Ithacan Answers

Last week's issue of The Ithacan included an article concerning the Student Council meeting held October 4, 1960.

At this meeting, the Sophomore class presented an address attacking administrative policies. Dr. Earl E. Clarke, who was present at the meeting, called this address, "emotional and self fish".

The Ithacan presented what it considered to be the whole and factual picture. The article included both excerpts from the speech by the sophomore class and excerpts of the comments made by Dr. Clarke.

The article did not conclude whether the demands were reasonable or unreasonable. The Ithacan was not in a position nor had it the information necessary to make an evaluation.

Since last week's issue, the sophomore class has apologetically told Dr. Clarke and the faculty how they would go about the procedure they used in presenting their grievances.

Some members of the sophomore class have endeavored to complete their presentation at the administration's suggestion. Thus, together, students and faculty will work to alleviate a serious and valid grievance.

No one denied that Ithaca College students are temporar ily overcrowded. Dr. Clarke stated that "While in the past at least 10% of those who apply for admission to Ithaca College don't show up, 100% of those who paid their deposit showed up this fall."

Dr. Clarke also mentioned that "we have been faced with a dilemma to either tell the many applicants there is no room and thus keep them out, possibly forever, or to move over and let them present at the meeting, called this address, "emotional and selfish".

The Ithacan is not pro-student, pro-administration, anti-student or anti-administration. Articles in The Ithacan try to compile a list of these grievances for submission to the administration. Dr. Clarke also mentioned that "we have been faced with a dilemma to either tell the many applicants there is no room and thus keep them out, possibly forever, or to move over and let them present at the meeting, called this address, "emotional and selfish."
The geography of the Grande Duchy of Dill is vague. The records left for us are incredibly five-volume, stained and dog-eared. We know, however, that the Duchy was located somewhere in a beautiful valley, full of woods and streams, rolling hills and fat raindrops.

The population of the Duchy was a fantastic mixture of races and religions. It would be impossible to trace the origins of the people and it must simply be left that the various ethnic groups were "well integrated." There was a negligible amount of anti-semitism, propagated primarily by the semitic themselves.

We cannot concern ourselves with the ancient past of the Grande Duchy of Dill. Some say it was founded by Pan; and there is some evidence to support this theory. At any rate, the study of music was one of the primary social institutions. The Duchy was divided into three Barons. The divisions were based on the interests of the people, depending on the physical, mental and artistic inclinations of those people. Some enjoyed lifting things and putting them down again while others preferred to sit and think about them. The third group, as we have mentioned, liked to make different kinds of sounds.

The Grande Duchy of Dill was a constitutional monarchy. King Dill was a descendent of a long line of military men. The Duchy was ruled by a Parliament composed of the usual two houses: the House of Lords, led by Lord Snark, and the House of Commons, led by Sir Fred Smug. King Dill was greatly concerned with the opportunity to cope with the government. He was greatly assisted by Sir Fred Smug and there was harmony throughout the realm. This harmony was termed by the Dillins as "The Great Peace." It lasted for two years.

As was the custom, each year the Grande Duchy of Dill permitted the immigration of several hundred barbarians from the outer districts. These barbarians were then exposed to the highly advanced culture of the Dillans. They were allowed to choose residence in any of the three Barons, depending on their likes; and then to pursue this interest for a period of four years at the end of which they might be exiled in the hope that they might spread some of their observed culture. King Dill was a true philosopher.

At the end of the second year of "The Great Peace," an unusual number of immigrants turned up at the Immigration Office. It was rumored that the Huns were sweeping over the continent. The Director of Immigration, Sir Fred Smug, being of great and good heart, granted entrance to each applicant. Lord Snark was informed of Sir Zion's action and, him- self being of great understanding and sympathy, undertook to protect each and every immigrant equally.

At the capital city of The Grande Duchy of Dill was located a Great Mead Hall, probably left by the early Anglo-Saxon inhabitants of that area. All immigrants, and a few of the less fortunate citizens, partook of their festive bread prepared at The Great Mead Hall by one Lord Speck. Because of the population increase, it was crowded and uncomfortable. Few of the immigrants complained of the food, but there was a great amount of unrest throughout the kingdom because the immigrants failed to get on well with each other. The Baron of Stover Muggins was composed of a particularly offensive populace who were exceptionally discordant and noisy. They were the cause of much INDIGNATION and were looked upon in great hearty surprise. It was suspected that they were descendants of Grundel and his mate Grundelina. There is, however, no proof that the Grundel story is true.

At the first meeting of Parliament that year, Sir Fred Smug brought the National Discontent to the attention of Lord Snark. The text of his Glorious Address (written, by the way, on the back of an envelope) follows:

From: The House of Commons of The Grande Duchy of Dill
To: The House of Lords

"Ye Lords of The Grande Duchy of Dill Sirs:

By your leave, we take this opportunity to present a grievance. We believe, to the best of our knowledge, that the administrative system of The Grande Duchy of Dill has failed the People. We believe the entire population to be the cause of the Great Unrest. We believe that King Dill, our Honoured Sovereign, is guilty of neglect and that our Prime Minister, Lord Snark, is guilty of mismanagement. It is well known that the Great Mead was opened.

The Grand Duchy of Dill

Hall is the scene of Great Unrest, that our newest citizens (immigrants) are hot-people, and that the Great Carts are badly managed. The natural sanity of our new citizens, coupled with the mismanagement of our Great Leaders, gives us cause to grieve.

(Lord Snaak was much grieved to hear this from His People. As he stood before the entire Parliament, with a hush all around him, he sobbed uncontrollably for a half-hour. The people began also to sob. This was known as The Great Sob.

Yet nothing was ever done by the House of Lords. As an insignificant scribbler put it, "The lamentations are discouraging by nature. If they would learn how to be Nice People, there would be no more Unrest. This is naught, since it is obvious from the way they abuse each other about while they get into the Great Cart that they did not intend to become Nice People."

It must be noted that the Great Mead Hall branched off into another section of the kingdom, actually a colony, called Der Quagmire. It was the hope of the administration that the Branch Mead Hall would alleviate the Great Unrest in the Great Mead Hall. One of the Great Carts, sometimes referred to as "rumble-wag," went to the colony at noon. This was known as "Congress On Wheels." There are no records extant that tell us why the other two Great Carts were left in distress. We do know, however, that the immigrants were emotional and selfish and that they did not understand the concept of Dynamic Cooperative Congestion.

Meanwhile, The House of Commons was tight-lipped. The nature of this social problem was too complex for commoners to handle, and it was decided to leave everything in the hands of The House of Lords. In the hopes that some King would succeed in his imperialistic venture to the south and that the Grande Duchy of Dill would soon expand into new lands across the Sea of Pecuni, which bounded the Duchy on two sides.

The Grand Duchy of Dill faces what may prove to be its toughest game of the season this Saturday. The Bombers journey into Connecticut to face Southern Connecticut State College.

The Blue and Gold, now one and one for the season, dropped a close 12-12 decision to C.W. Post College on Saturday. Post struck quickly in the first quarter for two touchdowns and a 13-0 lead. Ithaca's only score came in the second quarter on a three-yard plunge by halfback Gary Hill. The tip of the point was blocked and Post held the lead at half, 13-0. The second half saw Ithaca threatening several times but Bomber defenses managed to contain the visitors but to no avail.

Southern Connecticut has long been one of the top small college football powers in the East.
