

This paper was written with the intent of analyzing the paradox of fiction, the seeming contradiction between the idea that people only experience emotions from things we believe to be true and the fact that people do experience emotions from fiction. The paper mostly looks at several different solutions to this paradox, with commentary from me on both the proposed solutions provided by other papers, as well as my own proposed solution to this paradox.