Sinfonia (for Orbiting Spheres)

Sinfonia (for Orbiting Spheres) is music in the shape of a solar system, a collection of rococo loops that twist around each other within a larger orbit. The word “sinfonia” refers to baroque works for chamber orchestra but also to the old Italian term for a hurdy-gurdy, a medieval stringed instrument with constant, wheezing drones that are cranked out under melodies played on an attached keyboard. It’s a piece that churns and roils, that inches close to the listener only to leap away at breakneck speed, in the process transforming the ensemble turns into a makeshift hurdy-gurdy, flung recklessly into space. Sinfonia (for Orbiting Spheres) was commissioned by the Los Angeles Philharmonic.

Sinfonia Concertante for four winds and orchestra in E-flat, K.297b

This work has been controversial to Mozart scholars for years. Due to the loss of its manuscript, a considerable debate was created in the 20th century about whether it is a work by Mozart.

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart composed Sinfonia Concertante (K.297B) originally featuring flute, oboe, horn, and bassoon, which was supposed to be performed during his visit to Paris in 1778. However, the score was taken away by the performance manager and never got performed nor returned. From that time, the piece was considered lost until a copy was found in a Mozart scholar Otto Jahn’s estate after his death in 1869. Yet, this found version is written for oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon. According to a letter written by Mozart, scholars now believe this version (K.297b) was freshly copied out from Mozart’s memory once he found out that his scores will not be returned. The piece was then published by Breitkopf & Härtel in its Complete Mozart Edition of 1877. The work became well-known and regularly performed.

Sinfonia Concertante features a quartet of oboe, clarinet, bassoon, and horn soloists, with an orchestra of two oboes, two horns, and strings. It consists of three movements: 1) Allegro, 2) Adagio, 3) Andante con varizioni. There are some special features which deserved to be recognized. For example, the first movement is a varied sonata form which has three expositions (one by the orchestra and two by the soloists), with a cadenza before the coda; the third movement comprises a theme with ten variations, separated by orchestral ritornello, with a change to 6/8 time (before that, the whole piece is in 2/4 time) in the coda.

A typical performance lasts about 28 minutes. In today's performance, we are featuring esteemed professors of IC School of Music: Paige Morgan (oboe), Michael Galván (clarinet), Christin Schillinger (bassoon), and Alexander Shuhan (horn).

Symphony No. 3

Polish composer Witold Lutosławski's life spanned most of the 20th century. Through its geopolitical tumult, he developed various compositional techniques and styles, making significant contributions to 20th century repertoire. Born right before the beginning of the First World War, he experienced violence and was displaced from his hometown of Warsaw several times. When he did attempt to leave on his own volition to study composition in Paris, German and Russian invasion of the Poland thwarted his plans, instead causing him to be drafted into the military. During his service, he was captured by the German army but later escaped and walked his way back to Warsaw.

Even after the end of the Second World War, the Stalinist political climate required that he be careful with his compositional output. Stalin supported Socialist Realism in the arts and considered Modernist music to be anti-government. Consequently, Lutosławski composed in three disparate styles: popular pieces for casual consumption, concert pieces that incorporated Polish folk elements, and more private pieces in which he explored new compositional techniques. However, escalating degrees of censorship frustrated Lutosławski, who was against the principles of Socialist Realism. His First Symphony was banned as a result of this censorship, but what frustrated him the most was that his “Children’s Songs,” one of the popular pieces in which he saw little artistic merit, received an award from the government for artistic achievement.

Nonetheless, Lutosławski continued to develop his own techniques in his private compositions. Among them, the technique that features most prominently in his Third Symphony is Limited Aleatorism. Aleatoric music is music in which not every element is strictly dictated, leaving performers to make spontaneous decisions, resulting in unique sounds at each performance. Lutosławski saw his first aleatoric influence in John Cage, but he further refined this technique, the result of which we hear in the Third Symphony. Significant parts of this work are notated so that individual players play dictated rhythm and pitches but out of sync with one another, or repeat a passage until the conductor moves on to the next section. Connecting these aleatoric passages are more traditionally notated, “in-time” sections that the ensemble plays together, resulting in an effect of constant sway between sonic chaos and order.

The Third Symphony was completed in 1983 and was dedicated to conductor Georg Solti and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Perhaps because of CSO’s famous brass section, Lutosławski employs a four-note motive that is most prominently played by the brass throughout the piece. The piece is not just a brass showcase though—listeners will hear all sections of the orchestra employing all of their colors to create the piece’s ever-evolving soundscape.
