Collaboration is becoming a rarity in these tough years. “Music is meant to bring people together,” as is the common saying. However, more and more composers tend to seek no collaboration efforts with fellow composers who can offer new ideas to take and use. In other work settings, collaboration is often used for the success of all parties involved, like the peace corps for example. So why do composers often choose to work independently? This work is meant to be a symbol of collaboration deficits between composers, therefore resulting in tonal and rhythmic dissonance between the two voices. The listener will occasionally receive a taste of collaborative effects, represented by a more traditional duet. This represents the gratifying moment when collaboration efforts join for a worthy cause, creating a unifying effect on the world. This piece is split into four sections; Cornered, Stubborn, Anxious and Osmosis. As the listener will see, unification through collaboration survives the piece. Please enjoy, and feel free to reflect on this during the performance.
